THE REGISTRY OF NATIONAL HISTORIC LANDMARKS

The Congress in 1935 declared it a national policy to preserve for public use historic sites, buildings, and objects of national significance for the inspiration and benefit of the people of the United States. A first step in carrying out this policy is to identify the sites, buildings, and objects of national significance. For this purpose the National Survey of Historic Sites and Buildings was activated in 1957 as part of the MISSION 66 program of the National Park Service. From this program has grown the Registered National Historic Landmark program, through which the sites, buildings, and objects of national significance are recognized by the Federal Government.

The study and identification of historic sites and buildings is a cooperative process in which State and local agencies and professional historians, architects, and archeologists share their knowledge with staff historians and archeologists of the National Park Service. The field of American history has been divided into periods or themes, ranging in time from early man almost to the present. A study is prepared for each theme and submitted for evaluation to a Consulting Committee of eight persons eminent in the fields of history, architecture, and archeology. Their findings are submitted to the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments for recommendations to the Secretary of the Interior. This double screening by the Consulting Committee and the Advisory Board is to assure that no important site or building is overlooked and that no substandard site is included in the Registry of National Historic Landmarks. From this list a limited number of historic sites and buildings may be selected for inclusion in the National Park System, following appropriate legislative action by the Congress.

The following criteria are used by the Consulting Committee and the Advisory Board in judging the national historical significance of sites and buildings.

1. Structures or sites at which events occurred that have made a significant contribution to, and are identified prominently with, or which outstandingly represent, the broad cultural, political, economic, military, or social history of the Nation, and from which an understanding and appreciation of the larger patterns of our American heritage may be gained.
2. Structures or sites associated importantly with the lives of persons nationally significant in the history of the United States.
3. Structures or sites associated significantly with an important event that outstandingly represents some idea or ideal of the American people.
4. Structures that embody the distinguishing characteristics of an architectural type specimen, exceptionally valuable for a study of a period style or method of construction; or a notable structure representing the work of a master builder, designer, or architect.

5. Objects that figured prominently in nationally significant events; or that were prominently associated with nationally significant persons; or that outstandingly represent some great idea or ideal of the American people; or that embody distinguishing characteristics of a type specimen, exceptionally valuable for study of a period style or method of construction; or that are notable as representations of the work of master workers or designers.

6. Archeological sites that have produced information of major scientific importance by revealing new cultures, or by shedding light upon periods of occupation over large areas of the United States. Such sites are those which have produced, or which may reasonably be expected to produce, data affecting theories, concepts, and ideas to a major degree.

7. When preserved or restored as integral parts of the modern urban environment, historic buildings not sufficiently significant individually by reason of historical association or architectural merit to warrant recognition may collectively compose a "historic district" that is of historical significance to the Nation in commemorating or illustrating a way of life in its developing culture.

8. To possess national significance, a historic or prehistoric structure, district, site, or object must possess integrity.

For a historic or prehistoric structure, integrity is a composite quality derived from original workmanship, original location, and intangible elements of feeling and association. (A structure no longer on the original site may possess national significance if the person or event associated with it was of transcendent importance in the Nation's history and the association consequential.)

For a historic district, integrity is a composite quality derived from original location, and intangible elements of feeling and association.

For a historic or prehistoric site, integrity requires original location and intangible elements of feeling and association. (The site of a structure no longer standing may possess national significance if the person or event associated with the structure was of transcendent historical importance in the Nation's history and the association consequential.)

For a historic object, integrity requires basic original workmanship.

9. Structures or sites which are primarily of significance in the field of religion or to religious bodies but are not of national importance in other fields of the history of the United States, such as political, military, or architectural history, will not be eligible for consideration.

10. Birthplaces, graves, burials, and cemeteries, as a general rule, are not eligible for consideration and recognition except in cases of historical figures of transcendent importance. Historic sites associated with the actual careers and contributions of outstanding historical personages usually are more important than their birthplaces and burial places.

11. Structures, sites, and objects achieving historical importance within the past 50 years will not as a general rule be considered unless associated with persons or events of transcendent significance.

12. Structures, sites, and objects proposed for addition to the National Park System must also meet standards of suitability and feasibility.

THE NATIONAL REGISTRY OF NATURAL LANDMARKS

This new program complements the Registry of National Historic Landmarks by identifying and promoting the conservation of sites which illustrate important natural conditions and processes. It began officially in March 1964, with announcement of the eligibility of the first seven sites for registration as Natural Landmarks.

The program is concerned with outstanding natural exhibits and environments in geology and ecology regardless of ownership.

Nominations of sites for registration may be made to the National Park Service which studies the sites. These studies are evaluated by the Secretary of the Interior's Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments for recommendation to the Secretary as to eligibility for Landmark designation.

Objectives

The objectives of the Natural Landmarks program are to encourage the preservation of sites importantly illustrating the geologic and ecologic character of America; to enhance the educational and scientific value of sites so preserved; to strengthen the cultural appreciation of the natural history of America among people; and to foster a greater concern and involvement in the conservation of America's natural heritage among Federal, State, and local governments, citizens organizations, and individuals.

Standards

Sites will qualify for Natural Landmark status when found to satisfy the following criteria:

1. The site contains an object, feature, or assemblage of biological or geological features that importantly illustrates a principle, process, or condition of nature.

These may include, but are not restricted to:

Outstanding geological formations, or features illustrating geologic processes.

Significant fossil evidence of the development of life on earth.

An ecological community which significantly illustrates characteristics of a physiographic province or a biome.

A biota of relative stability maintaining itself under prevailing natural conditions, such as a climatic climax community.

An ecological community illustrating the process of succession and restoration to natural condition following disruptive change.

A habitat supporting a vanishing, rare, or restricted species.

A relict flora or fauna persisting from an earlier period, or as a remnant of a population formerly more widespread.

A seasonal haven for concentrations of native animals, or a vantage point for observing concentrated populations, such as a constricted migration route.

A site containing evidence which illustrates important scientific discoveries.

II. The site possesses a quality distinctly above the average of its kind.

III. The natural object, feature, or assemblage of features, identified as the basis for landmark consideration, presents a true, accurate, undistorted natural example of the same.

The object, feature, or features will have been created, and will be found to exist, for the most part, under the influence of natural forces.

Manipulation of the environment is acceptable to the degree necessary to neutralize unnatural influences, to perpetuate a rare or particular species, or to better expose a geologic feature for study or interpretation.

IV. The site is of such size and location, as to give reasonable assurance that the feature, its quality, and its naturalness can be preserved.

In this respect, the site will be large enough to maintain the essential quality of its geological or ecological character, and to adequately illustrate the process or feature. It will be so located as to be reasonably invulnerable to deterioration by developments outside its boundaries.

V. The site is in responsible ownership, sympathetic with Landmark objectives and agreeable to preservation of the values for which it is designated.
